the program before taking final action.

Board members heard Appomattox County High School principal Cecil Tillery give a progress report on the high school's achievement toward the overall school plan for the 1974-75 session.

Some of the objectives of the plan are effective use of audio-visual aides, definative reporting of student progress and improved community-school relations.

Mrs. Henritta Johnson and Mrs. Ann Ramsey reported to the board on the Reading Skills Program, including a review of teaching techniques, supplementary services, available teaching material and testing to determine the progress of individual students.

Mrs. Elizabeth Keaton, Special Education Instructor, reported on the program for exceptional children in the county schools. Mrs. Keaton told board members that the program is now available to students from primary grades through middle school and that the five year plan for the program will call for availability at the high school level for the 1975-76 school year.

Richard Carter told the board members that 93 students are involved in the Adult Education Program. The adult students are taking classes in art, brick laying, typing, general education review, basic sewing and basic education.

Carter also said that adult physical education classes will be available in the near future under the direction of Gordon Bragg.

Mrs. Jean Hesson, General Supervisor of Instruction, told board members that eight teachers are enrolled in a University of Virginia Extension course, Test and Measurements, and that a second course, Environmental Studies, will be offered by UVa. next semester.

Mrs. Hesson also said that teachers are organized into system wide instructional departments which will help upgrade the entire curriculum of the county schools.

The next school board meeting will be held Dec. 13 at 3: p.m. in the board room.

Turnover High Among Managers

(Reprinted from the Roanoke Times)

So many city managers, county executives and the like are having trouble these days as to raise the question: Is there any one difficulty common to them all? The current roll call is depressing:

In Blacksburg there is a petition not to reappoint Town Manager William B. Cook. Radford's City Manager Kyle Roop Jr., has resigned. The Clifton Forge City Council has decided, 3 to 2, not to reappoint City Manager M. A. Barnes.

In Portsmouth City Manager Phineas E. Horton III has become unpopular over the appointment of a police chief. And in Albemarle County, Executive T. M. Batchelor has been found guilty of "malfeasance." But since no corruption was involved, the judge did not remove Mr. Batchelor from office.

None of these situations is exactly alike; there is no single diagnosis when the Council-Manager form of government shows symptoms. But the old country doctor, on the basis of experience, would look for two things: Councilmen or supervisors who have the itch to be the manager; and, more rarely, managers who turn themselves into politicians and would-be policy makers.

Sometimes it's the city manager's fault when the councilman, supervisor or mayor wants to run his office for him. The requirement of a city manager is to be willing to leave. Sometimes a board of supervisors or city council is so impressed by their manager that they don't make the touch policy decisions themselves. But the basic responsibility always remains the same: the elected board for policy; the manager for administration. And the basic rule for the voter remains the same: If you don't like the way the town is being run, put the heat on the elected body - not the manager.

Whether the current rash of troubles is extraordinary cannot be said with sureness. There's always a certain amount of friction in local government; the average term of a city manager was calculated, several years back, to be six years. But if every other official and every local government manager stuck to the basic rules, you could put the names of all these managers in a hat, let each local government draw one and the localities could perk along on a good basis for several years.

The survey will also provide the first insight into the acreage planted this fall to winter wheat and rye under conditions where farmers are again free to produce for the market place without Government controls.

Mrs. Nancy N. Johnson urges all producers to cooperate fully about feed grain supplies and prices.

in the late November and early December survey. All information is confidential and only State and National summaries will be published.
